MANUEL

Manuel lived in a small fishing village on the west coast of South America. Palm trees waved on the sandy beach. In a small bamboo hut Manuel wolfed down his breakfast of fried fish and bananas. Today was the most exciting day in all the twelve years of his life. For the first time his father Pedro was going to take him fishing.

Other men were down at the shore when Manuel and his father arrived. They called out, "You caught a fish already Pedro, and now he is carrying your net."

Manuel flushed in anger. They all think I am too young. I'll show them, he said to himself. As Manuel and Pedro slid their tiny boat into the water, Pedro said, "Now remember! You must do exactly what I say. This is a dangerous business."

"Will there be sharks, father?"

"It is not very likely," Pedro said, "but there is always something to watch out for."

Manuel watched the ocean ahead of them carefully. Suddenly he shouted, "Look! Look! Ahead of them, a dark, shimmering cloud took shape in the water.

"That's it," Pedro smiled joyously. "Those are corbina. Now shift the sail. Easy! I'll get the nets over." Pedro stood braced against the motion of the waves. Manuel watched his father carefully. At the right moment, the opening of the net must be pulled tight to imprison the dozens of fish swimming peacefully by.

Manuel glanced idly at the other side of the boat. His whole body stiffened. Cutting thru the water was the dark tip of a black fin. "Look, father! Look!"

"Manuel, be quiet!" His father was annoyed. "Maybe you aren't old enough to go with me after all."

"But father, it's a shark!"

His father looked around as the shark went under. "There aren't any sharks here. Use your eyes. A good fisherman can't be jumpy."

Manuel sighed and shrugged his shoulders. If the shark was not driven away, he would rip through the nets; the fish would escape, and the nets would be torn, almost beyond repair. Manuel bent down quickly. He picked up the shining harpoon. Then he waited. The ugly black fin came closer and closer. Finally, Manuel threw the harpoon from his hand with a tremendous lunge. It hit just behind the narrow dangerous head. The shark plunged down swiftly into the water. The rope slipped through his hands until there was no more slack.

"Manuel, can't you be still?" Pedro was very angry. His back was turned and he did not realize what was happening.

Manuel had no time to explain; at any moment the precious harpoon might be snatched out of his hands. Winding the end of the harpoon cord around his fist, Manuel dove over the side.

Pedro turned around as he pulled the net in over the other side. A great pang of fear shot through him. "Manuel! Let go of the harpoon! There may be other sharks in the water!"

Manuel would not let go. He swam strongly, trying to get back to the boat. Pedro searched the waters anxiously, fearing to see another sharp black fin, cutting through the waves. With desperate haste, he changed the course of the boat. The distance between them lessened with agonizing slowness.

At last Pedro reached over the side. Manuel grasped his hand and pulled himself up, gasping. He still held the harpoon line in his hand.

Together, they hauled on the line. The shark had weakened. The long tapering head came close to the side of the boat, jaws snapping feebly. Up over the side . . . one thrust of the short, sharp knife, the tail thrashed wildly; and life was gone. The shark was dead.

Pedro threw his arms around Manuel. "My son that was a brave thing to do. You think quickly. You'll be a fine fisherman."

The men would not be able to tease him now. Manuel smiled with pride. He had proved himself.

2200 MILES A YEAR

And Goodyears keep the going smooth—mile after mile

Charles Morin is only 16, but he knows where he's going: the University of Detroit and a degree in electrical engineering. To help pay his tuition, Charles delivers papers seven days a week. He's a good bowler, and a steadfast user of Goodyear bike tires.

There's nothing like a tough newspaper route for finding out about bike tires. Charles Morin has one of the toughest.

Every day he delivers the Free Press in crowded Detroit. And to carry him through snow, ice and rain, Charles depends on a pair of rugged Goodyear tires.

Goodyear bike tires are made with rubber that's especially resistant to bumps and bruises. Their treads grip and hold, for better traction on curves, for straight-line stops.

Whether you use your bike for work or fun, you'll get more out of it—and more out of your tires—when you ride Goodyears. There are no better bike tires built. See your Goodyear dealer soon. Goodyear, Cycle Tire Dept., Akron 16, Ohio.

BEST FIRE ENGINE

"I'm tired of fires!" sobbed Chester passionately. "I'm tired of racing my wheels off to get there on time! I'm tired of being pulled out of bed at all hours of the night, interrupted at all hours of the day! I'm tired of the smoke and the noise and the heat! I'm just plain sick and tired of it all! I'll never go to another fire again!!"

"WHAT?" roared the deep bass voice of Zachariah, the oldest engine in the yard. "Why, what's a fire engine for, if not to go to fires?? Of all the . . ."

CLANG! CLANG! CLANG! The sudden blasting of the fire alarm interrupted him. In two seconds the whole yard was a beehive of activity! Zachariah's voice rose above the din. "Come along just this once, Chester!" he shouted. "And stick close behind me all the way!"

"But I . . . oh, all right! But this is absolutely, positively, the last time!" Chester shouted back. "And it's only because I don't want to be disrespectful . . ."

But Zachariah was already half-way out of the yard. Chester had no choice but to follow—and follow he did, right up to the blazing building itself!

"Now!" commanded Zachariah sternly. "Look around you, boy! Look at that little baby over there!" He pointed to a tiny infant nestled in his mother's arms. A fireman—one of Chester's crew, in fact—was leading mother and child to safety. "If you hadn't brought that fireman here," continued Zachariah, "that infant, and its mother, would have been trapped in the fire! Now look up there . . ." He pointed to a high window from which poured smoke and flames. A squad of firemen balanced a ladder up to the window, and one by one, the people inside the burning room were climbing down to safety. "If you hadn't carried that ladder, all those people would have been trapped, too!" observed Zachariah. "Now look over there . . ." He pointed to the building next door which was being showered with sparks from the fire. The firemen played their hoses all over it to keep the blaze from spreading. "If you hadn't carried that hose over here, that building would catch on fire, too, and a million dollars worth of property would have been damaged . . ."

"Stop! Stop!" sobbed Chester. "I've been a selfish, spoiled brat! I never stopped to think . . ." He couldn't go on. He was crying too hard!

"There! There!" The oldest engine's voice was gentle. "We all make mistakes! I'll bet you'll be the best fire engine in the whole yard from now on!"
